GETTING CREATIVE BEATS

OVERCONSUMPTION

CONSUMERISM

lessons from lockdown

Re-set
Finding pleasure in play, culture and experience rather than the false promise of shopping for more ‘stuff’, is a potentially big, positive step for raising our well being and lowering ecological impact. It makes us feel better for longer and, done well, uses fewer resources and produces less waste. When shops closed during the pandemic it turned out that behind all that passive consumption, many people were in fact frustrated producers of their own entertainment and jumped, or in some cases danced, at the chance.

The Italians showed us the way. In March 2020 when the word “lockdown” was still strange, the world watched enthralled as communities across Italy, who were confined to often very small apartments, began to use what outside space they had – often just a balcony – to come together in music, dance and song. With all the usual forms of public face-to-face entertainment shut, a huge national concert was held, in which everyone played at home with their doors and windows open to whoever wanted to listen. One dancer used the only time he was allowed into the street – to put out his household waste – to perform to rapturous applause from his neighbours.
Some also dusted off their turntables and took time to listen together to music they already owned and remembered how much they liked it. Lockdowns proved to be a boon for the vinyl market, which enjoyed its best year in decades in the UK as fans deprived of live gigs spent their spare cash on their record collections. Sales of vinyl rose 13% to £110m, and now accounts for a surprisingly high 40% of the total £271m physical music market. Overall, the physical and digital music market rose 6.8% to £1.5bn.

An incredible one in six Americans sing in a choir, so not being able to sing together had a big impact on a huge number of people. Many community choirs turned to virtual meeting technologies in a mass, spontaneous experiment in collaborating online. Since video platforms experience a 300-millisecond to one-second lag between computers over the internet, directing and singing music simultaneously is difficult. So people found ways of working to enable people to get as much joy out of singing as possible by listening and singing on mute or pre-recording parts. An ensemble in Canada sang from their cars, streaming the music over the slightly-faster radio waves using microphones, a mixer and an FM transmitter to prevent the lag time experienced online.

The Association of British Choral Directors even published information on how to lead choirs in lockdown. An online survey of nearly 4000 choir members in the UK identified that continuing the choirs online – even in a limited way – improved people’s sense of wellbeing, was important for their community and social identity, and encouraged creative co-creation. It is also an activity that is about using what you have – your voice – rather than buying a new toy.

“Dark clouds can have silver linings – personal tragedy and communal grief were the dark clouds of the pandemic but the stimulation of the arts and entertainment through enforced staying at home added flashes of silver. And not just works ‘on your own’ like painting and writing but the online world buzzed with communal singing, dancing and drama. It often requires a shock to a system to open up possibilities and they then stay open to reveal what is possible to increase our wellbeing.”

Ian Roderick, The Schumacher Institute

As the pandemic spread and other countries and populations found themselves similarly trapped inside for much of the day with friends or family, there was an outpouring of human creativity. Families played old games, inventors made up new ones, people did art and craft in groups, and millions of others took advantage of a huge range of ready-made entertainment activities in the virtual world via online communities. Many of these revealed our need for connection and showed how well we functioned without the travel and razamatazz of elaborate, expensive activities.

“The most immediately available form of home entertainment – the television or games console – was a big winner. With cinemas, theatres and music venues closed, millions forced to stay home for their video entertainment and already fed up with regular daytime TV, turned en masse to streaming video services. Industry analysts had commented that this trend was already happening, but the pandemic sped-up the pace of adoption. Providers jostled for market share, subscriptions rose across the board and pay-per-views became increasingly mainstream. Netflix became a household name and “binge-watching” a common experience for all but the extremely self-controlled. Overall spending on digital entertainment in the UK soared by 17% year-on-year in 2020 – the fastest annual rate in the 25 years the Entertainment Retailers Association (ERA) has been compiling figures. This experience mirrors other historical experiences, such as in during the Second World War, when spending shifted from resource-intensive material goods to entertainment and cultural activities.

As the pandemic spread and other countries and populations found themselves similarly trapped inside for much of the day with friends or family, there was an outpouring of human creativity. Families played old games, inventors made up new ones, people did art and craft in groups, and millions of others took advantage of a huge range of ready-made entertainment activities in the virtual world via online communities. Many of these revealed our need for connection and showed how well we functioned without the travel and razamatazz of elaborate, expensive activities.

“Time together as laughing, singing, dancing people is vital to counter the way the economy so often boxes us into spending, competing, me-first people: the arts help us bring a more humane economy into being.”

Dr Katherine Trebeck, Wellbeing Economy Alliance

Overall spending on digital entertainment in the UK soared by 17% year-on-year in 2020 – the fastest annual rate in the 25 years the Entertainment Retailers Association (ERA) has been compiling figures. This experience mirrors other historical experiences, such as in during the Second World War, when spending shifted from resource-intensive material goods to entertainment and cultural activities.
Many musicians and other artists took to sharing their teaching skills online for the first time, aimed at new learners taking advantage of more spare time to take up an instrument. The recent popularity of the ukelele continued, with virtual learning communities teaching, learning together and supporting each other. Many of these online options also enabled musicians to earn a living of some kind, when all other sources had disappeared overnight. And geography is no barrier, with one British man taking advantage of Australia’s time difference to find a teacher in the early hours of the morning before his young family wakes up and others finding tuition for unusual instruments easier to source overseas.

Dancing was an activity that demanded some of the highest ingenuity during the pandemic, with online classes proving popular, living room dancefloors booming, and students keeping up their physical fitness and skills by dancing at home in gardens and bedrooms. The Dutch National Ballet made an at home ballet to connect people and keep the love of dance alive. General keep-fit at home also flourished, while yoga aimed at online, with the UK’s fitness guru Joe Wicks getting millions of people off the couch for his 30 min morning workouts. Yoga aimed at beginners also drew huge new audiences, with Adrienne seeing up to 35m viewers on some videos.

Many writers and artists are used to working alone, but lockdown encouraged people to use those activities in a more communal way, to ease the sense of isolation and be part of something bigger. In the UK, ceramicist and TV documentary maker, Grayson Perry, hosted an Art Club with his wife, in which people sent in their art and he chose a selection to be part of an eventual real world exhibition. The Art of Rapid Transition held an online exhibition on Instagram to provide a platform for art students. Local art groups sprang up to provide an outlet for creativity and a social gathering for more vulnerable or isolated people to have fun while painting or drawing. The Getty Museum in Los Angeles challenged people to recreate some of their favourite works at home with minimal props and then share their artistic interpretations on social media, with hilarious results and a huge viral phenomenon. This inspirational idea illustrated beautifully how much fun can be had with very little; huge numbers of people raided their wardrobes, sheds, tool cupboards for props that brought joy and laughter to so many others.

It was not just dance floors that popped too, encouraging communities of the pandemic to continue. Digital connectivity has allowed the hybridisation of board games and puzzles. The runaway success of Netflix’s stylish series focusing on a young woman chess prodigy, “The Queen’s Gambit”, also created a real world explosion in the popularity of board games and puzzles. The Getty Museum in Los Angeles challenged people to recreate some of their favourite works at home with minimal props and then share their artistic interpretations on social media, with hilarious results and a huge viral phenomenon. This inspirational idea illustrated beautifully how much fun can be had with very little; huge numbers of people raided their wardrobes, sheds, tool cupboards for props that brought joy and laughter to so many others.

But it was not all about screens – in fact, many people were fed up with online activities and Zoom meetings and classes, and families enjoyed a surprising return to basics with a huge upswing in the popularity of board games and puzzles. The Getty Museum held an online exhibition of an eventual real world exhibition. The Art of Rapid Transition held an online exhibition on Instagram to provide a platform for art students. Local art groups sprang up to provide an outlet for creativity and a social gathering for more vulnerable or isolated people to have fun while painting or drawing. The Getty Museum in Los Angeles challenged people to recreate some of their favourite works at home with minimal props and then share their artistic interpretations on social media, with hilarious results and a huge viral phenomenon. This inspirational idea illustrated beautifully how much fun can be had with very little; huge numbers of people raided their wardrobes, sheds, tool cupboards for props that brought joy and laughter to so many others.

Many writers and artists are used to working alone, but lockdown encouraged people to use those activities in a more communal way, to ease the sense of isolation and be part of something bigger. In the UK, ceramicist and TV documentary maker, Grayson Perry, hosted an Art Club with his wife, in which people sent in their art and he chose a selection to be part of an eventual real world exhibition. The Art of Rapid Transition held an online exhibition on Instagram to provide a platform for art students. Local art groups sprang up to provide an outlet for creativity and a social gathering for more vulnerable or isolated people to have fun while painting or drawing. The Getty Museum in Los Angeles challenged people to recreate some of their favourite works at home with minimal props and then share their artistic interpretations on social media, with hilarious results and a huge viral phenomenon. This inspirational idea illustrated beautifully how much fun can be had with very little; huge numbers of people raided their wardrobes, sheds, tool cupboards for props that brought joy and laughter to so many others.

But it was not all about screens – in fact, many people were fed up with online activities and Zoom meetings and classes, and families enjoyed a surprising return to basics with a huge upswing in the popularity of board games and puzzles. The Getty Museum in Los Angeles challenged people to recreate some of their favourite works at home with minimal props and then share their artistic interpretations on social media, with hilarious results and a huge viral phenomenon. This inspirational idea illustrated beautifully how much fun can be had with very little; huge numbers of people raided their wardrobes, sheds, tool cupboards for props that brought joy and laughter to so many others.

But it was not all about screens – in fact, many people were fed up with online activities and Zoom meetings and classes, and families enjoyed a surprising return to basics with a huge upswing in the popularity of board games and puzzles. The Getty Museum in Los Angeles challenged people to recreate some of their favourite works at home with minimal props and then share their artistic interpretations on social media, with hilarious results and a huge viral phenomenon. This inspirational idea illustrated beautifully how much fun can be had with very little; huge numbers of people raided their wardrobes, sheds, tool cupboards for props that brought joy and laughter to so many others.

Many writers and artists are used to working alone, but lockdown encouraged people to use those activities in a more communal way, to ease the sense of isolation and be part of something bigger. In the UK, ceramicist and TV documentary maker, Grayson Perry, hosted an Art Club with his wife, in which people sent in their art and he chose a selection to be part of an eventual real world exhibition. The Art of Rapid Transition held an online exhibition on Instagram to provide a platform for art students. Local art groups sprang up to provide an outlet for creativity and a social gathering for more vulnerable or isolated people to have fun while painting or drawing. The Getty Museum in Los Angeles challenged people to recreate some of their favourite works at home with minimal props and then share their artistic interpretations on social media, with hilarious results and a huge viral phenomenon. This inspirational idea illustrated beautifully how much fun can be had with very little; huge numbers of people raided their wardrobes, sheds, tool cupboards for props that brought joy and laughter to so many others.

But it was not all about screens – in fact, many people were fed up with online activities and Zoom meetings and classes, and families enjoyed a surprising return to basics with a huge upswing in the popularity of board games and puzzles. The Getty Museum in Los Angeles challenged people to recreate some of their favourite works at home with minimal props and then share their artistic interpretations on social media, with hilarious results and a huge viral phenomenon. This inspirational idea illustrated beautifully how much fun can be had with very little; huge numbers of people raided their wardrobes, sheds, tool cupboards for props that brought joy and laughter to so many others.
REFERENCES

1. Youtube
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=EBB3YiJvNzs

2. BBC News
https://www.bbc.co.uk/news/av/entertainment-arts-52406474

3. Forbes

4. The Guardian
https://www.theguardian.com/media/2021/jan/08/uk-lockdowns-fuel-record-year-for-home-entertainment-spending

5. Green Party
https://www.greenparty.org.uk/assets/files/reports/the_new_home_front_FINAL.pdf

6. The Guardian
https://www.theguardian.com/business/2020/nov/21/uk-vinyl-sales-gigs-covid-record

7. The Guardian
https://www.theguardian.com/media/2021/jan/08/uk-lockdowns-fuel-record-year-for-home-entertainment-spending

8. The Guardian
https://www.theguardian.com/media/2021/jan/08/uk-lockdowns-fuel-record-year-for-home-entertainment-spending

9. Post-Gazette
https://www.post-gazette.com/ae/music/2020/02/03/Pittsburgh-Concert-Chorale-chorus-singing-health-Pittsburgh-Mendelssohn-Choir/stories/20200201290111

10. The Guardian

11. NPR

12. ABCD
https://www.abcd.org.uk

13. Frontiers

14. ABC News

15. Youtube
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=d4TkFmSjz-A&list=PLJFa3EaocfZncpdhCRBCF302yHnaF8oq

16. The Guardian

17. Xinhuanet
http://www.xinhuanet.com/english/2021-05/09/c_139732718.htm

18. Youtube
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ba2o78aKDD0

19. Youtube
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=FuvXG4As80c

20. Youtube
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=maw2tI2Z2NM

21. Youtube
https://www.youtube.com/user/yogawithadriene

22. My Modern Met
https://mymodernmet.com/coronavirus-quarantine-art-club/?fbclid=IwAR3cIIZF2FR76WCOXU5c2s3pTJ0wxf00bCA4p3_I6EDyD70uJAxJ6V08U

23. Graysons Art Club
https://www.graysonsartclub.com

24. Instagram
https://www.instagram.com/cop_art26/

25. Bristol Art for All
https://bristolartforall.com/age-uk-online-art-class/

26. Culture Health and Wellbeing Alliance

27. Metro
https://metro.co.uk/2020/04/01/people-recreating-famous-artworks-viral-challenge-12477755/
REFERENCES

28. Tech Crunch

29. CNN

30. Chess.com
https://www.chess.com

31. Board Game Geek
https://boardgamegeek.com

32. Forbes

33. Meeple Mountain
https://www.meeplemountain.com/articles/the-ultimate-guide-to-board-game-cafes/

34. Wired
https://www.wired.co.uk/article/play-board-games-online

35. Board Game Arena
https://en.boardgamearena.com

36. Table Topia

37. Steam Powered
https://store.steampowered.com/app/286160/Tabletop_Simulator/

38. Youtube
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Su704GUb0s

39. Forbes

40. Artful Parent

41. Artful Parent
https://artfulparent.com/body-tracing-activity-for-kids/

42. Exploratorium
https://www.exploratorium.edu/snacks/subject/ecology
This guide has been made possible by the support of ClimateWorks Foundation – climateworks.org – and is published by the Rapid Transition Alliance – rapidtransition.org – where you can find many of these examples explored in more detail.